Kiruna is the gateway to the Alaska of Europe // You have to take a close look at the place on a map of Europe to determine just how far north we are. 145 km north of the Arctic Circle, the sun shines for 50 days at a stretch. The average highest temperature is around 15 degrees celsius. This is why our packing list is getting longer and longer. From Munich Central Station we're at the airport in no time at all, where we check in our special travel rucksacks all the way to Kiruna. Once we've stowed away all of our important travel documents in the detachable daypack, we're off via Stockholm to the wilderness of Lapland.

After a total of 17 hours travelling time we find ourselves on the approach to Kiruna. But where is the city, the airport? For almost one hour we have been flying over a surreal landscape. Scattered forests, many meandering rivers and over and over again the tundra landscape, the fjäll, or mountains. Only when we're nearly on the ground do we see the runway, and one road that leads through untouched nature. So we're not really surprised that we simply have to walk out of the plane and across the landing strip. But no worries: the next plane isn't expected for another three hours.
